

For all the reasons of a nuisance factor, with the big deal going down on the aisle seat, and the big break up going down on the window seat, and all the middle seat wants to do is sleep or perhaps play solitaire or work! Now the most important reason, is that you have now put a communication tool in the hands of a terrorist who can communicate with partners in crime on the airplane and on the ground.

What I want to know about this, is will he FCC recommend to relax the rules to allow the telecommunications giants an opportunity for all those golden minutes that they have up to this point not been able to crack. I find it very interesting that I have written 10 letters to newspapers all over the country on this topic and NONE of the letters were published. I tied each to a particular article that was already run in the paper. Could it be that telecommunications and the print media are in bed on this?
